Types of Events

The University of Pennsylvania hosts a diverse range of economics events designed to cater to various interests and professional levels. These events can be broadly categorized into the following types:

Conferences

Conferences are major events that bring together scholars, practitioners, and students to discuss and present research findings. These gatherings often feature keynote speakers, panel discussions, and networking sessions. They provide a platform for sharing innovative ideas and fostering collaboration across disciplines.

Workshops

Workshops are typically more hands-on and focused on specific topics within economics. They often involve interactive sessions where participants can engage in discussions, case studies, and group activities. Workshops are excellent for skill development and gaining practical insights from experts.

Guest Lectures

Guest lectures are events where notable economists and industry leaders share their insights on contemporary economic issues. These sessions offer participants the opportunity to learn from experts and ask questions, making them a valuable addition to any academic curriculum.

Seminars

Seminars are smaller, more intimate gatherings focused on specific research topics. They typically feature presentations from faculty or graduate students, followed by discussions. Seminars promote in-depth exploration of niche areas within economics.

Networking Events

Networking events are designed to connect students, alumni, and professionals in the field of economics. These events often include informal meet-and-greet sessions, career fairs, and mentorship opportunities, helping participants build valuable connections.

Notable Past Events

Throughout its history, UPenn has hosted numerous notable events that have significantly impacted the economics community. Here are some highlights:

The Penn Economics Conference

This annual conference attracts leading economists from around the globe. Participants present their research papers and engage in discussions on pressing economic issues. The conference has featured prominent speakers, including Nobel laureates and influential policy-makers.

Annual Economic Policy Symposium

This symposium focuses on the intersection of economic theory and public policy. It invites policymakers, scholars, and practitioners to discuss the implications of economic research on real-world issues. The symposium has addressed topics such as health care economics, labor market policies, and environmental economics.

Women in Economics Roundtable

This event aims to promote diversity within the field of economics by highlighting the contributions of women economists. It features panel discussions, networking opportunities, and mentorship sessions, fostering an inclusive environment for aspiring economists.

Benefits of Participating

Engaging in UPenn economics events offers a plethora of benefits for students, professionals, and researchers. Below are some key advantages:

- Networking Opportunities: Participants can connect with industry leaders, potential employers, and fellow students, expanding their professional network.
